CONFIDENTIALMARHABA!

[REDACTED] Scientific Linguist,
(Language and Area School)

If someone came up to you on the street and said "Marhaba, kiif haalak?" the chances are you wouldn't know whether it was Arabic, Eskimo, or Martian. And who could blame you for not knowing? Americans, when they study foreign languages at all, generally study French or German or Spanish, and there's nothing wrong with that. But since the Second World War we have come to realize more and more the need for a widespread knowledge of other languages as well--languages of peoples who are now coming to play a more and more important role in today's world. We don't need speakers of Martian--yet--but we certainly need speakers of languages like Arabic. No one who reads the papers these days can possibly doubt the influence and importance of the Arab world. In the past few weeks we have seen conferences called, troops moved, navies redeployed--in fact we have seen the whole world thrown into a state of serious fear of war--because of an event in one Arab country. And when we consider that there is not just one Arab country but many, and that these countries extend over millions of square miles of some of the richest and strategically most important regions in the world, then we are forced to begin thinking of Arabs as something more than characters out of Arabian Nights. They are very real people. They are Egyptians and Syrians and Moroccans and Saudi Arabians and Lebanese, and others, over fifty million of them. And they all speak Arabic. For all these people, "Marhaba, kiif haalak?"--or something much like it--is an ordinary greeting to a friend, and means "Hello, how are you?".

I have just said that all fifty million Arabs speak Arabic. It would be more accurate to say that they all speak some form of Arabic. The fact is that some of these forms of Arabic, or dialects, differ fairly widely from each other. A farmer from Morocco, for example, and a farmer from a village in Iraq, if they ever got together, would be able to understand each other only with great difficulty, if at all. Their pronunciation of certain words would be quite different; here and there, they would use altogether different words for the same thing, and now and then, each would use whole phrases peculiar to his own region but unknown to the other. Nevertheless, each one would think of himself as speaking "Arabic," and each would be right, as far as that goes. The distant ancestors of both probably did not live so far apart, and certainly would have had no trouble understanding each other. But as the Arab peoples spread out and migrated, the language they spoke changed in different ways in different places, and finally developed into the various dialects heard today. There are six or seven principal colloquial dialects, each with a good deal of variation within itself. Every Arab, whether it is our farmer in Morocco or a university professor in Cairo or Beirut, learned one of these dialects when he was a small child, just as we learn English, and speaks it as his normal everyday means of communication with his fellow-citizens.

If you have decided that you want to learn to speak "Arabic"—to speak, not read and write—then the first thing to do is decide which dialect you want to learn. If you know that you are going to visit or be concerned with a particular region, then of course you should learn the dialect of that region. But perhaps you are interested in the Arab area as a whole, or do not yet know exactly where your main interest will be. In that case, the best choice is one of the more central dialects, say Palestinian or Lebanese Arabic. If, knowing one of these dialects well, you travel in any direction from that region, you will of course find greater and greater differences the farther you go, but in general you will be able to make yourself understood anywhere. Then, if you should want to learn a second dialect, you would find that you could do so in a relatively short time because of your knowledge of the first. After all, a basic similarity is present in all the dialects, and not all of them are as different from each other as Moroccan and Iraqi.

Besides these geographical dialects, there is another kind of Arabic. It is spoken in every part of the Arab world, everywhere in exactly the same way, but relatively few people can speak it, and they do so only at certain times and places. This is the Arabic variously called "classical," "written," "literary," and "standard." (All these terms are appropriate in part, but no one of them tells the whole story. I will use "classical" here, as it is probably the most widely used of the four.) Classical Arabic, first of all, is the language of religion. It is the language of the Koran, the holy book of the Moslems. And along with this it is the language of education, which children are taught in schools, and in which all formal education is conducted. No one learns this language naturally as his mother-tongue. A thorough knowledge of its grammar is acquired only after years of study; only well educated people can speak it. This is the Arabic which is heard in the mosques, in schools, from the lecture platforms at universities, on the radio, in formal speeches, and in general wherever gravity and dignity are called for. And most important of all, it is the Arabic in which everything is written. Books, newspapers, pamphlets, announcements—if anything is written in Arabic at all, it is almost invariably written in Classical.

In the terms of linguistic science, Classical is another dialect of Arabic, the only difference being that whereas the colloquial dialects are distributed geographically, Classical is distributed educationally and situationally. But the Arabs themselves do not generally think of Classical Arabic as just another dialect. They think of it as the only real Arabic, and of what they speak at home as just a corruption of this pure tongue. This is a misconception, of course—and a kind of misconception by no means limited to Arabs: any language spoken naturally by a group of people is "real"; languages do not become corrupted, they merely change; and no language is pure unless you take last Tuesday as your standard. Nevertheless, it is certainly a fact that the feeling the Arab has for "his" language (which to him means Classical, whether he is educated or not) is something very special, very strong, and very solid. He feels the language itself to be almost holy because of the holy writings it preserves; and more and more today he feels the language to be a political factor serving to unify all Arabs across national boundaries.

Prospective students always ask whether Arabic is hard, and the answer I usually give is "Well, yes, and no." Hard to learn to speak one of the colloquial dialects? Well, harder than Spanish, yes, but not as hard as Navajo. Hard to learn to read Classical? Well, yes, fairly hard, but by no means impossible. And as a matter of fact often fun, if you like puzzles. Looking up words in the dictionary is very often a puzzle in itself, even after you have learned the Arabic alphabet. Let me give an example. Here are three words:

yaktubu	"he writes"
maktabun	"office"
kitaabun	"book"

These words will all be found in the dictionary under "k," and nowhere else. They are found there because they all belong to a group of words having in common the sounds k-t-b in that order, regardless of other consonant sounds at the beginning or end and regardless of vowels anywhere. Vowel letters themselves are no help anywhere, because in written Arabic they often don't appear at all, so that for the first two words in the above list all you would see written would be yktb and mkbt. But don't be discouraged. There is a system to it all, and a system that takes only a very short while to get used to. And when you learn that the word ittifaaqun is to be found under "w," you can consider yourself over the hump.

We need people with a knowledge of Arabic. There are too few Americans who have it, and the usefulness of it is becoming more apparent almost by the hour. As is the case with any language, even a little knowledge will make a visit or an assignment many times more rewarding, both personally and professionally. This is particularly true in Arabic countries, where the people are so proud of their language, and so very glad to hear foreigners speaking it. It will make all the difference if, when you are walking down a street and someone says "Marhaba, kif haalak?", you can answer easily in the old formula, "Mabsuut, alhamdu lillaah!"—"I'm well, praise God!"

INTERPRETATION OF REGULATION [REDACTED]
"HEADQUARTERS PARTICIPATION IN TRAINING"

A number of questions have arisen regarding the interpretation of CIA Regulation [REDACTED] "Headquarters Participation in Training," dated 18 July 1956. Subject to change by higher authority the Office of Training intends to adjudicate these questions on the basis set forth below:

QUESTION A: Should components report only training conducted during duty hours?

ANSWER : Yes, however, OTR will credit officially sponsored external training conducted by non-Agency training activities during evening hours.

QUESTION B: May participation in military reserve training be counted?

ANSWER : No. Such training is not creditable.

QUESTION C: May external on-the-job training arranged by the component concerned without cost to the Agency and without formalization as an official training activity be reported?

ANSWER : No. Such training must be approved by OTR.

QUESTION D: May attendance at professional conventions such as the American Association of Manufacturers or the American Society of Psychologists, etc., be reported?

ANSWER : No. Attendance at these conferences is not considered to be training.

QUESTION E: May travel time expended in connection with going to and from training programs be reported?

ANSWER : No.

QUESTION F: May time spent in a university course arranged at personal expense be reported?

ANSWER : No. Such training is not approved by OTR for purposes of this regulation.

QUESTION G: May time spent in area familiarization programs be counted?

ANSWER : Yes, if the area familiarization program has official approval.

QUESTION H: May time spent in research, when such is a required part of an approved academic program or when research is a total activity approved by OTR, be reported?

ANSWER : Yes, when such activities are consistent with the intent of this regulation.

QUESTION I: When an employee takes leave without pay to participate in a formal academic program, such as graduate study, may such training be reported?

ANSWER : No, since the individual is not counted as part of the headquarters on-duty staff while in a leave-without-pay status.

QUESTION J: May annual leave and sick leave be considered in determining the 5% of total man-hours to be reported by Agency components?

ANSWER : No. Computation of annual and sick leave in connection with the monthly status reports for each component would be an unmanageable problem, and personnel on annual or sick leave are part of the on-duty headquarters strength of the Agency.

QUESTION K: Several Agency components engaged in planning for the training of their personnel have noted that the OTR Catalog indicates a requirement for laboratory or other non-classroom preparatory work in connection with part-time language training and have raised the question as to how to compute the creditable hours for such instruction.

ANSWER : OTR has developed the following formula for use in determining creditable hours:

For each classroom hour in a part-time language course given by the Language and Area School, 1 1/2 additional hours will be credited representing laboratory or other non-classroom preparatory work: total, 2 1/2 creditable hours. This formula applies up to a maximum total of 40 creditable hours in any one week, and pertains only to part-time language-internal courses scheduled by the Language and Area School as listed in the OTR Catalog or announced in OTR Bulletin. The Office of Training will apply this formula in reporting creditable hours.

EXAMPLE:

The first part-time language course listed in the OTR Catalog is:

ELEMENTARY SPOKEN (PHASE I)

DURATION Ten weeks; five two-hour classes per week

Applying the "1 1/2 hour" formula to DURATION:

5 x 2 equals 10 classroom hours per week
10 x 1 1/2 equals 15 non-classroom hours per week

25 total creditable hours per week will be reported by OTR.

QUESTION L: How does OTR compute training hours for training other than part-time language training?

- ANSWER : (1) Full- or part-time OTR courses — hours credited are shown in the OTR Catalog description under the title, "Duration."
- (2) Full-time officially sponsored external training — eight hours are credited for each government work-day in which the trainee is absent from headquarters in a training status.
- (3) Part-time officially sponsored external training — the hours credited are those specified in the catalog of the institution concerned. Lacking this specification, the hours credited are those actually spent in formal training.
- (4) Officially sponsored correspondence courses — are credited according to the number of hours specified in the catalog of the institution.

QUESTION M: How is the training received by in-casuals, JOT's and persons in transition from one office to another credited?

ANSWER : Training hours generally are credited to the component which enrolls the individual.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

AND

FOREIGN LANGUAGE DEVELOPMENT AWARDS

(By Chief, Language and Area School, Office of Training)

The Director of Central Intelligence, in January, directed that a plan be designed to provide Agency employees with the incentive to learn foreign languages. Accordingly, a committee consisting of representatives from all major components developed a plan that was submitted to, and approved by, the CIA Career Council in February, and adopted by the DCI in March.

The plan is to be implemented by two CIA Regulations entitled Foreign Language Development Program (CIA Regulation [REDACTED] and Foreign Language Development Awards (CIA Regulation No. [REDACTED] which are presently being coordinated by the Regulations Control Staff. Essential provisions of the plan as proposed by the committee are:

25X1A

- a. The language requirements of all staff positions will be identified and, as rapidly as is reasonable and feasible, all employees occupying, or designated to occupy, those positions will be scheduled for training to develop the required type and degree of fluency.
- b. All career staff employees who acquire and maintain certain defined types and levels of language competence during employment by the Agency may qualify periodically, by test, for cash awards. The awards available in any single language vary from a single award of $50 to a maximum of $1,200 plus recurring annual awards of $400.
- c. A Language Specialists Program is created to permit selection, from throughout the Agency, of a small number of unusually qualified employees for special training as Language-and-Area Officers. Emphasis in this program will be given to those languages which are unusual, difficult, and in short supply.
- d. A Language Proficiency Testing Program will provide the basis for determining:
  1. Qualifications for awards.
  2. Potential for engaging in successful language study.
  3. Satisfactory possession of language requirements required for designated Agency positions.
  4. Types of training most suitable for persons possessing varying degrees of language competence.

- e. A Language Resources Roster of Agency personnel will be established and maintained. The roster will list all staff employees possessing any language competence, and evaluations of competence as determined by standard proficiency tests.

The Foreign Language Development Plan derives from the concept that the Quality of intelligence collection, evaluation, analysis, and production frequently depends upon the linguistic ability of employees engaged in these activities.

Two principal objectives of the plan are:

- a. To increase the active participation in language training programs.
- b. To develop Agency language resources which may be needed in the future.

Keynote of the awards program is recognition of effort. Awards will not be given for initial possession of language competence, but only in recognition of effort expended to acquire and to maintain proficiency. Amounts of awards will be determined according to estimates of the comparative effort required in attaining and maintaining differing types and levels of foreign language proficiency. Standards of performance to qualify for awards will be relatively high. These standards, however, are not unreasonable. A person who satisfactorily completes a conventional, full-time basic intensive language course as given by one of the several Government language schools or by OTR, for example, should be able to qualify for the program. One might expect to qualify in Russian, for example, after completing the Agency's eleven-month basic Russian course.

The plan provides all Agency employees the opportunity:

- a. To take advantage of established, formal language courses offered by the Agency, and
- b. To apply for selection, on a basis of merit and competition, for intensive specialized training as Language-and-Area Officers.

Formal announcement of these programs will be made during the autumn when CIA Regulations [REDACTED] are issued. Simultaneously, there will be issued an Agency Notice setting forth details on procedures, schedule of awards, dates for testing, and other explanatory information.

DON'T BURY THAT TALENT!

Three and one-half years ago, the Office of Training was assigned the responsibility of producing motion picture films to supplement Agency instructional programs. During that time, several films have been completed, among which were two, full-length features on clandestine training. Presently, OTR is doing a series of seven films on another specialized field of instruction.

Every film requires the same production mix -- script, direction, photography, sound, editing --- and a cast. In the production of our training films, one person is responsible for scripting; there's a director, the camera crew and an editor. In some cases it is necessary to contract for some of the production work. But not so the cast. Roles must be portrayed by employees of the Agency. These roles may vary from that of the principal who is required to memorize extensive lines and stay "on camera" for a considerable length of time to that of a "walk-thru" who does just that - "camera right" to camera left." One actor may have to absent himself from his office for several days; another, only several hours. He may be asked to accept TDY to a location site for a period of a week or more.

Experience? None is necessary. For those who have done work on stage or on camera the way will be easier. However, for those without experience, don't let that be a deterrent. All you need is the willingness. Think about it. It could be just one other role you can play in helping the Agency discharge its mission. You will find it is work but it can be fun, too. We would be happy to have you tell us of your interest. Won't you do just that by calling [REDACTED]
